

Jessica Roza is a veteran, public affairs and government relations professional, community builder, and storyteller with more than 15 years of experience spanning municipal, state, and federal government. A third-generation veteran and former Army National Guard and Army Reserve paralegal, she has dedicated her career to public service, strategic communications, advocacy, leadership, and community engagement.

Jessica founded West Valley Women Veterans to create the kind of community she wished had existed during her own transition from military service. What began as a small brunch with three women veterans has grown into a thriving network that brings women together through connection, volunteer service, leadership opportunities, education, and recognition.

Her work is shaped by both professional and lived experience. As a woman veteran, survivor, former military spouse, and longtime advocate for underserved communities, Jessica understands the importance of belonging and believes that meaningful relationships are one of the strongest foundations for lifelong well-being.

Jessica holds a Bachelor of Science in Homeland Security and Emergency Management with a minor in Criminal Justice Administration and has completed additional professional development in trauma and resilience, human trafficking, political social work, strategic communications and public leadership. She serves on several boards, commissions, and advisory councils dedicated to supporting veterans, military families, crime survivors, and civic engagement throughout Arizona.

Through West Valley Women Veterans, Jessica remains committed to ensuring that every woman who serves has a place where she feels seen, valued, connected, and empowered to continue making a difference in her community.
